Sexually transmitted diseases have long been known to be associated with an increased risk of subsequent malignancies. The association between genital warts and penile and anal cancers has been clearly established. The link between anogenital human papillomavirus (HPV) infections and squamous cell cancer of the penis, vulva, vagina, anus, and cervix remains controversial. The potential link between genital warts and penile, vulvar, and anal cancers has been suggested. Anal squamous cell cancer is the second most common cancer among men in many countries and regions, but it is not a commonly seen cancer in the United States. Although the natural history of penile cancer is well established, the pathogenesis of val
